Fao the examiner

Having gone through the hearing and listened to wpl on their quest to run rough shod over the little community "hardly London" I think one comment re foot path closure it just strengthens my opinion as to their plan to get this through and sell it on as a concern nothing more than a cash cow and not for the good of infrastructure of the country.

Other projects of this nature stand idle until government subsidies are gained if this is the case it's not an essential requirement but is very lucrative for the parties behind the venture .

There seems to be a certain amount of shall we say lack of professionalism in their approach considering the scale of the project to the lack of information for a catalogue of things still in the wings

They have pushed people to their plans they are not wanted by us residents in very close proximity they were not wanted at the MEALOR gas plant but forced access via compulsory order Scottish power didn't want them on original statement but will have to facilitate them via compulsory connection when built

The requirement in this area is non existent for what they'll produce if it's built if they get hand out from government, sold on the premise of useful asset to the Ind Est which turned out to be hokum The ramifications to us locals would be ignored causing further noise build up potential pollution potential endangerment in gas leakage and explosions and not to mention the depreciation to property prices

This if given the go ahead would be a total blot on the landscape too big a project for locality and no landscaping in the world could soften it even if I their pictures of the site were accurate which we know to be inaccurate even if "industry standard"

Promissory note for construction funds in place could a clause not be put in place that if it is built they solely own it for a period of years ? Bet they'd run a mile from it then !

Also how could they recoup out lay if the government closing them in 2030 in phase out of gas plants ? Doesn't equate if part time on demand site
