I would like to log my deeply held belief that this solar 'farm' is a grave and dangerous undertaking. It is too big, too close to large populations and too fraught with possible and definite disaster. The possible disaster is with the massive batteries which have been banned in other countries around the world because they have the tendency to burst into flames, and these are not any flames, these are flames that give off highly toxic gasses which cannot be put out! The definite disaster is the destruction of wildlife across the site and the ruin of a fantastically important carbon sink. The best thing for this land would be to return it to salt marsh, which protects human habitations from rising sea levels, storms and high water, they provide a home for enormous numbers of creatures vital to our future survival.

Please do not let this power station go ahead on this site.

Yours faithfully
