

Communities here and up and down the country have been made to feel like 2nd class citizens, having their lives turned upside down by the threat of the unnecessary dismantling of rural lifestyles and heritage.

Unprecedented change to the detriment of local citizens who do not want these things littering the landscape, because they know in the end we will be robbing peter to pay paul in the name of blinkered net zero ambition.

The only true winners will be the opportunists, who were allowed to take the easy option on solar development.

The point of the planning process is not to blindly apply national policy, but assess the suitability of an application or applications in their specific local setting.

Selective policy interpretation and creating an urgent narrative that somehow makes inefficiency at this scale acceptable to the world is unhelpful to genuine ambition.

Solar is a poor use of land, there is no getting away from this.

The priority and the only real urgency is to get solar onto the thousands of acres of UK rooftops to kickstart the Government's Rooftop Revolution.
