

I am dismayed at the cumulative applications for solar farms over thousands of acres of Lincolnshire. These are cereal producing acreages and whilst the arguments are that it is a small percentage of the UK's agricultural land - it is in fact a much higher percentage of cereal productive land. This is a further decimation of one of the UK's last remaining productive industries. As an island nation with a massive immigrant influx this is increasingly short sighted. All planning and politics are currently for short term gains with no consideration for future generations - this is in effect the destruction of the countryside and rural living. It used to be that the lack of services and support for rural areas was balanced by quality of life in a rural environment. This solar development is personally causing me to become a cynic that there is any form of democracy remaining or anything sacred that can't be commercially exploited.
