There really is no need for any changes in the area unless it would be to remove the existing roads and return them to near as possible original appearance.

Any considered increase in existing traffic will soon be irrelevant as it will not be long before only the very wealthy will be able to afford petrol as is the assumed intention of manipulating the continued rises in oil prices.

There is no reason why the existing roads that surround the extreme perimeter of the heritage area could not be widened

Disturbing the area in any way and especially underground risks disturbing the ley lines and the energies that flow through them as their importance is not yet known to us we should disturb them until we fully understand why the site was chosen for Stonehenge and what purpose the ley lines serve

Also if you really want to change the area do not do so until you have held a referendum and give the whole of the UK population a chance to express their choice about changing an area that belongs to and has belonged to the population of this country for thousands of years. I for one say it is not up to the decision of a few bureaucrats and petty officials to affect something that belongs to nearly 70 million people.
