To whom it may concern

In response to the issue about Stonehenge, I've been past it many times and even spent time camping near there in the early 1970s. I've been an archaeologist artist for many years and respect all ancient monuments as a valuable part of our inheritance.

I also know that the Earth's crust is constantly moving and therefore, as we have no control over that, we do have a responsibility to manage what we can in terms of our planet's protection. Our generation will come and go, as have many before us, and, instead of being arrogant, I think it would behoove us to think of future generations too!

I do hope you'll consider keeping any earthworks as far away from the stones as possible, considering their value.

I hope this is received and helpful

Sincerely

Julia Wilson
