To whom this may concern,

A have a dear memory of visiting Stonehenge with my grandmother when I was 16, a trip that I will never forget. Years later and now the government are considering (yet again, after the first outcry against the plans for the new road) to build the A303 and basically destroy a national monument that has existed for centuries. Not only is it ruining a timeless moment in history but the environmental damages it will cause to the wildlife surrounding it will be disastrous. This government spews nothing more than empty lies and broken promises, we have only one planet and it is already dying, why would you want to further this? [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] and anyone in the small percentage of people who are rich enough to not bother worrying about the world they are living in need to take responsibility for their actions and start making changes that suit everyone not just themselves. Im [REDACTED] and I would love to have children at some point. Until there is a drastic change in what this world is going to look like in the coming years (as of now it looks very bleak, a continuous cycle of taking what we want from the earths natural resources with no consideration to the environmental and humanitarian cost, then pumping our waste where it can't be seen by the overly distracted west) there will be no chance of this for me. Building this road would be a mistake, evening moving the plans of where to build it is a mistake. It should not be carried out at all. It will put more cars on the road producing even more CO2 emissions (as if that's what we need) purely for convenience. Well, I've got news for you, life isn't convenient. Life is hard, pretending to make it easier for everyone when in reality something like this is destroying natural wildlife and the livelihoods of those in neighbouring villages and towns. It is outrageous that this is still even being considered and you think people won't speak up. They will. This simply can't go ahead.

Sincerely,

Lillie-Jane Hatfield-Tugwell
