Dear Sir,

As so often in such matters, the discussion becomes dominated by data and technical assessments - and social interests

We should return to basics.

The dominant basic is that Stonehenge is as great and majestic as any human monument in the world. Any solution that interferes with the scenic and archeological zone as a whole should be rejected on principle.

This is the starting point. The needs of traffic can only enter the equation once that principle has been established. Traffic is ephemeral in the long term. Stonehenge is for eternity (or as long as our planet lasts).

Yours sincerely,

Martin Kemp
