Dear Secretary of State for Transport,

That a national organisation such as National Highways should even think of placing a 'road improvement' project that would endanger both a World Heritage and National Heritage historical site just beggars belief! One seriously has to consider the degree of education and common sense (or lack of it) that these people have.

I think we are all aware of the pressures imposed by increasing population and transport but there is always a Plan B. The sacrificial altar of 'economic interest' only goes so far. This said, the financial gain brought about by tourism should not be underestimated and this could be put in jeopardy if the site is declassified and/or becomes unattractive to visitors.

National Highways need to seriously review their copy and do a road plan that makes sense and is the least destructive possible. They also need to get their heads out of the sand and listen to the protests worldwide that this plan is causing.

We are talking about a unique British - and World - Heritage site here and, in theory, the national government should be acting in the interests of the public. A pious thought, I know, in many instances but there can be exceptions! Thank you.

Yours sincerely,

Terence RD Nelson
