

From: [REDACTED]
To: A303 Stonehenge
Subject: Stonehenge Road system
Date: 03 April 2022 09:33:45

I think recent findings that the area around Stonehenge is a lot bigger than we thought. This is a once in a lifetime opportunity to research the depth and understand, who or what built the monument of giant stones. Once touched it will never be the same again! These stones have been standing for hundreds of years. Does modern man really need to use that area to speed past, rumbling the grounds below it? Or can you not build another road, that can keep this area sacred for years to come?

You might feel that this is a pile of rock, in the way of the future, but I truly think these stones are a step back into our past.

We are already moving so fast, not enough research is going on into the real problems our future may hold. Do we really need to speed up our process of being somewhere before we set-off on our journey.

When you watch these programs about these monuments around the world, the surrounding land plays such an important role in the make up.

Do we really want to ruin the landscape of Stonehenge?

I urge you to rethink the whole project and even build another road away from the site

Regards

Gary Evans

Sent from my iPad