Dear sir,

I am vehemently opposed to the proposed work by National Highways to upgrade the roads around and leading to the site of Stonehenge. This historic site needs to be left alone so that it can be appreciated for what it is, a memorial to our ancestors' ingenuity and creative impulse. It is a mark of huge disrespect to the builders of this monument that we deem it right to deface the landscape surrounding this iconic structure with engineering answers to our twenty-first century obsession with transport. The car and the internal combustion engine are going to be phased out by the government's plan to decarbonise our civilisation so that future generations can survive. This project is reminiscent of the previous century when the building of wider and bigger roads was seen as the way forward. This can no longer be the case and National Highways needs to re-think its strategy, not just in the case of Stonehenge but in many other proposed road developments.

Yours sincerely

Adrian Kendon
