I am very surprised and disappointed that the government are still looking to continue with this road scheme at Stonehenge. UNESCO have advised that alternatives should be found and they will have had far more extensive experience of dealing with these problems than the government's advisors. Of course, the real answer is to reduce the amount of road traffic drastically by diverting it to rail leading to large savings in infrastructure and more efficient use of the existing rail system. Stonehenge itself is an iconic symbol of part of our history and it seems illogical to damage the World Heritage Site simply to create more traffic nearby. I sincerely hope that the government will abandon this project and do more to conserve our national heritage for the benefit of future generations.
