As someone who uses the car throughout the day for my work I have noticed a significant decrease in traffic on the roads this last two weeks, which I can only surmise is down to fuel costs. As this now is not going to change in the near future have National Highways factored this into their calculations? Many people are now limiting their car use. In Wales they have suspended all road building as part of its Climate Emergency Strategy, surely the rest of the UK should be taking this more seriously.
