The former old RAF base has been closed for several years, it has had zero impact to the aviation industry either domestic or commercial in anyway passenger or freight. Many owners of this old airfield have tried and failed multiple times to create a sustainable business on the site, many with vast amounts of experience in the aviation sector however all failed with massive loses. There is not a market for an airfield here for a number of environmental and geographical reasons. It is only just over a kilometer from Ramsgate a historic town with the only Royal harbour in the country, every report ever written has concluded that it is not sustainable, not environmentally viable, not needed, obviously there's more to it but read all the independent reports ever written, not one good word, if any other business went to a bank or a decent accountant with this business model, they would be laughed out. What is required is a mixed use development with sustainable growth and jobs which will aid the housing crises, employment in greater number than a halfwit airfield and bring more money to the area in business growth and homes. If you place your hand in a fire and it burns you do you do it again, no, you stop flogging that dead horse and do something different. No airfield no night flights no environmental disaster, yes to new growth new vision new direction. Einstein said the definition of madness is doing the same thing again and again and expecting a different result. So don't be fools and turn this down, the only people supporting this are people with personal interest, cucumber sandwich brigade and over 60s with a fond vision of biplane. The only way this will ever succeed is if Venus is in Mercury with Saturn rising at 4.21am on a Tuesday, in other words never.
